Crews at Schildberg Construction Company turned out their last truck loads of material under the watchful eye of Tim Baier and Steve Armstrong recently as both men retired, finishing long careers with the company.

Baier spent nearly 36 years and Armstrong 46 with the company.

Baier most recently was sales manager and Armstrong was general superintendent.

Both men worked in harmony with each other for a long time, meeting weekly to discuss various accounts and the endless relationship between sales and production.

Under Armstrong's careful watch, there were seven crushing and four stripping crews regularly operating. Their day-by-day production was ultimately his responsibility.

"I was just ready. I was ready to do what I want, to have freedom," Armstrong said of the decision to call it quits.

Armstrong isn't the first generation of his family to work at Schildberg Construction. His dad, Verle, worked there for 45 years, and the father-son duo's careers overlapped. Others in his family have also worked for Schildbergs.
