Concerts, an Illinois-based concert promoter that also is behind Tailgate N' Tallboys concerts that in 2023 will take place in Bloomington, Illinois; Taylorville, Illinois; Auburn, Michigan; and Rockingham, North Carolina.

Maddasion and Director of Parks and Recreation Josh Eggers spearheaded local planning, working alongside USA Concerts for more than a year to prepare for the festival.

"I could not have asked for better partners on the planning side of this event than Josh Eggers and USA Concerts & Events," Maddasion wrote.

"Partners is the key word. It took many conversations, texts, emails, and meetings to get to June 8, but we did it. I will forever be grateful for the partnership and friendship we created while bringing this great event to Clinton.

"Lastly, we all need to thank the City Council and the city departments. No way this gets done without them. I can only imagine what the council was thinking when Josh and I pitched this idea but ments of our city provided were invaluable."

He also said he was thankful for the sponsors and the many businesses that saw the potential for the event that featured four national acts each night and included Tim McGraw on Friday night and Jelly Roll closing out the festival on Saturday night.

One such supporter is James Hook of Hook's Pub and Grill in Clinton.

"I was very impressed by the setup, the performers and how Clinton showed up for it," Hook said. "It was a great event for Clinton and I hope this will bring in even more festivals and concerts. It's a perfect use of the riverfront area."

This is not a one-and-done event for the city, which is under a three-year contract with USA Concerts.

Clinton also will host Tailgate N' Tallboys in 2024 and 2025.

different museums and a lot of different places.

"They made a point when we were kids to always bring us, even when you're on vacation, to make educational trips and that just really stuck with me."

Noted among her favorites are the Smithsonian and the Field Museum in Chicago.

"We'd go to the Putnam like every couple months," Mussmann recalls.

Lately, though, her focus has been on getting reacquainted with the Sawmill Museum, located at 2231 Grant St., and its dedication to Clinton's lumber history.

"There's a lot of really fascinating parts," she says. "I really like the human aspect of history."

Her biggest challenge comes after Parbs let the board know in February, as he was nearing a decade spent as the director of the museum established in 2011, that his time there was coming close to an end.

"I wanted to make my 10 years, but I was ready to try something new," he says. "So it felt like after I made my 10-year anniversary at the museum, I wanted a chance to take what I did at the Sawmill and move it to the whole town."

On April 10, he took the position as Grow Clinton's vice president of community & economic development.

"Matt Parbs, the former director," Mussmann says,

"was here for so long that he's so ingrained in this museum that I really think that it's a blessing he's done an amazing job with it, so I'm starting with the museum that's in an amazing position, but there's also the challenge of I have to be able to bring in my own ideas into a museum that is so well-established and has been so well taken care of, it's a lot to step into."

Parbs looks forward to offering his guidance when needed.

"I will always have a soft spot for the museum," he says. "I think it's the special thing about the Sawmill and Grow Clinton, we have the same goal, which is to enrich the lives of our citizens."

named Wold and others in lawsuits related to the building collapse. The city also has said Wold will be charged for demolition expenses.

Since the collapse, officials have faced repeated questions about why tenants were allowed to stay in the building despite warnings that it had serious structural problems.

The day before the collapse, firefighters were called to the building because of concerns about an unstable wall. On Sunday, the city said fire crews went to the building and saw work was being done and there appeared to be shoring of the structure in place.

The release adds that a city building inspector also visited the site that day and "determined that the work appeared to be progressing in accordance with the plans and specifications previously submitted by a professional engineer." The city said there were "no observable signs of difficulty or bowing in the external shoring."
